I t's hard to imagine two cultural events more specifically American than the Super Bowl football championship and the Black History Month observance that the University of Idaho is celebrating this February. The two events are so perfectly intertwined that it's almost impossible to imagine one without the other. The University of Idaho is celebrating Super Bowl Sunday by hosting a special screening of Spike Lee's "Do The Right Thing," a movie that has become an iconic representation of black American culture and identity. The screening is part of the university's Black History Month observance, which is being held to honor the contributions of black Americans to our society and to raise awareness of the issues that continue to affect the black community.

The screening of "Do The Right Thing" is just one of the many events planned for Black History Month at the University of Idaho. Other events include a lecture series, a film festival, and a variety of cultural performances. The goal of these events is to provide a platform for discussing the rich history of black Americans and to encourage dialogue and understanding among all students.

In addition to these events, the university is also hosting a special football game on Super Bowl Sunday. The game will feature the Boise State Broncos and the Idaho Vandals, and it will be played on the university's newly renovated football field. The game is sure to be a highlight of the month, and it will provide a fun and exciting way for students to celebrate both the Super Bowl and Black History Month.

Overall, the University of Idaho's Black History Month observance is a wonderful opportunity to learn more about the rich history and culture of black Americans, and to come together as a community to celebrate our diversity. Whether you're a student, a faculty member, or a member of the local community, there's something for everyone at this year's observance. So mark your calendars now and come out to support these important events.
